Although the time of my first concentrate research on the topics in ancient and contemporary philosophical theories of metaphoricity presented here lies more than two decades behind, I wish to thank the Alexander von Humboldt Foundation and the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft for granting subsequently my research at the Institute for Philosophy [Philosophisches Seminar] of the University of Tübingen in two periods (1992–94 and 1996–99). Equally, I thank the Institute itself for having hosted my research and inviting me to teach courses during those periods. Without this support, both my research and my professional scholarly activity wouldn't have been possible due to the war time in former Yugoslavia.

It was a tough but precious time in which I had the opportunity to enjoy the intellectual attention and personal friendship of the renowned researchers and teachers at the Philosophy Institute, professors Manfred Frank and Hans Joachim Krämer†, who previously had been the mentor and supervisor of my 1987 doctoral thesis, as well as professor Thomas Alexander Szlezák. The discussions in this volume on metaphoricity in Plato and Aristotle as well as on the issues of philosophy of language and hermeneutics in general rely on the rewards I have received from their philosophical works and personal communication in this period and after.

In particular, I owe all my gratitude to professor Manfred Frank for his personal and institutional support as well as for his interest in the systematic part of my research. This goes also for a number of younger fellow scholars at the Seminar, especially for my colleague and friend Jürgen Pafel, for enduring late night discussions about different topics in the philosophy of language, linguistics and epistemology of metaphor. Equally, I wish to thank to Christof Rapp, then also editor in the Zeitschrift für philosophische Forschung, for inviting me to publish in the journal some reviews representative of my research project.

I also owe gratitude to the reviewers appointed by the publisher, whose suggestions have helped me improve in some respects the final versions of the essays, as well as to the proofreaders of both English and German parts of the book for their great friendly helpfulness and commitment in improving the style. It goes without saying that the responsibility for all imperfections in content and expression lies with me.

I hope that the errors that might have escaped my attention and knowledge are at least slightly improved now in comparison to how they were at the beginning or during revisions of studies included in this collection, so that there can be as much progress through errors as I hope there will be rewards to those who might wish to read the texts. ●
